The DVD release of the film includes an audio commentary by Christopher Smith. A luxury ocean liner – the Pacific Princess – sailing from Southampton to Singapore. Three friends, O'Neill, Abby and Andrew, board the ship and settle into their cabins. Aboard the ship, they meet a French couple and an enigmatic woman named Mao. The cruise soon comes under attack from a malevolent force that wreaks havoc throughout the ship, killing or injuring many of those onboard. O'Neill is separated from Abby and Andrew after fleeing their cabin during an earthquake triggered by this force. He teams up with members of the crew at the ship's bridge in order to rescue his girlfriend and friend before the attacking force can get them. As they descend further into the ship's bowels, O'Neill and Abby discover the truth: the Pacific Princess is haunted by a man named Mao and his troupe of dancers who have somehow escaped their purgatorial cycle and become trapped on the ship, doomed to die and be reborn. The force that has been destroying the ship is actually one of their souls; it can only be stopped by destroying their bodies – hence why O'Neill has been sent out to do so. However, before O'Neill can fulfil his destiny, he must help his friends from the force that has been attacking them. While Abby and Andrew attempt to reunite with O'Neill, Mao explains how he and the others who have escaped the cycle were trapped by a very powerful being – The Red Triangle – who has been waiting for a prophecy to be fulfilled. The film ends with a post-credits scene where it is revealed that The Red Triangle's true name is 'Triangle', as it possesses another passenger on board. It informs this passenger that "the time has come" as both The Red Triangle and the other passenger disappear into thin air.
